Strategic collaborations and partnerships between public institutions, research organizations, universities, startups, corporations, experts, and third-sector actors can be the key to a sustainable future. Cooperation, open innovation and cross-pollination models can boost the invention and the development of solutions for the common good. Three models of innovation management:

- Food CLIC: a framework based on system thinking, which guides food system actors towards desired outcomes of integration, co-benefits, linkages, inclusion and connectivity. Sharing of good practices and lessons learned with 13 European city regions and 3 African city regions.
- Coopen: a participatory process with the aim of fostering the identification of innovative, sustainable and concrete impactful and technological solutions to meet specific challenges related to sustainable development in Africa.
- Federated Innovation @MIND: a network of companies led by 40 market-leading multinationals. The network was created to act as ambassadors of the future in the present by turning utopian and far-reaching ideas into a mix of incremental and breakthrough innovations that will ultimately deliver a tangible impact
